

Contents

List of contributors	ix
Series editors' preface	xiii
Acknowledgments	xv
Introduction	1
Graeme Porte
Part I The case for replication studies	19
1 Why (or why not), when, and how to replicate research	21
Alison Mackey
2 Replication in published applied linguistics research: A historical perspective	47
Charlene Polio
3 Statistical significance tests and result generalizability: Issues, misconceptions, and a case for replication	92
Hossein Nassaji
4 Replication, meta-analysis, and generalizability	116
Luke Plonsky
Part II Replication studies in graduate programs	133
5 Practical methods for teaching replication to applied linguistics students	135
Rebekha Abbuhl
6 Conducting replication studies: Lessons from a graduate program	151
Tess Fitzpatrick vii

viii Contents

Part III	Replication studies in practice	171
7	Writing up a replication report James Dean Brown	173
8	Negotiated interaction in the L2 classroom: An approximate replication Johannes Eckert	198
9	The effect of task-induced involvement on L2 vocabulary acquisition: An approximate replication of Hulstijn and Laufer (2001) Susanne Rott	228
10	Concluding remarks: The way forward Graeme Porte	268
	Author index	277
	Subject index	283