Thanks and acknowledgements

It is notoriously difficult to acknowledge sources of teaching ideas. Rather like stories, rumours and urban myths, they take on a life of their own, spreading and changing as they move. The Internet has greatly contributed both to the circulation of ideas and to the difficulty of locating sources. Nevertheless, I have sincerely tried to acknowledge sources wherever I could and I apologise for any unwitting omissions.

I would like to thank my son, Sasha, for a host of story-based lesson ideas. With the enthusiasm and generosity of a new teacher, he seemed to have an endless supply of ‘things that work in the classroom’.

Colleagues at Sydney English Language Centre happily tried out lesson activities and met with me afterwards to suggest changes and variations. I thank them all.

Louise McCabe worked as my research assistant through most of the project, enabling me to make progress and meet deadlines. As always, she is a pleasure to work with.
